Gleanings from Facebook

From Peter Charles-Dashel Gott via Facebook

Q. Hi all! I have some questions; feel free to skip the background to them and just click the “more.” I joined the Gesneriad Society a few months back and planted some seeds I received and have been diligently moving the resulting seedlings around as I was told this would make them grow faster. I don’t have any previous experience to compare, but they definitely grew fast!

Now my questions: These biggest ones where one cotyledon just took off are Streptocarpus seedlings, yes? If so, how (and when) do I pot them? There is what looks like a stem coming down and then new leaflets growing out from where the first cotyledon meets the stem (forgive my ignorance of the correct botanical terms), but I’ve never seen a stem on streps. Does one bury the stem when potting them? How does the base of the crown of leaves end up at soil level? Or am I totally wrong and these are some other type of gessie?

Thanks in advance!

Paulo Castello da Costa

A. Keep them as they are, they will take care of adjusting themselves as they grow. They may well be Microchirita seedlings, in that case they are expected to have a stem and a big leaf.

I'm participating in a show this weekend. I tape cereal boxes with holes the size of my pots to the bottom of a larger box. See photo with arrows where I cut holes large enough for my fingers in cardboard boxes. These were entries from a previous year.
